PASTORAL THOUGHTS...

The book of Job is one of my favorite Old Testament books to reflect on during the Lenten season as it shows how God will be with us in times of trial. The book begins by presenting a man from the land of Uz as God's faithful servant who would rise early and offer burnt offerings. However, it quickly changes tone before the end of the second chapter when he lost his family, property, and health. After his wife saw the loss Job experienced, she asked Job to curse God, but Job refrained from doing so (Job 2:9-10).

Job's response helps me to see that picking up a Lenten penance isn't merely an act of deprivation. Instead, we should see the Lenten penance as an invitation to grow closer with Christ in our faith by depriving ourselves of something that normally would keep Christ at a distance. The goal of the Lenten season is not to arrive to the Easter Vigil Mass, but to have a new or rejuvenated drive to keep Christ active in our lives. Job recognized that we do not intuitively recognize every blessing, and this thought shouldn't be a hurdle to recognizing it. The recognition that we cannot perceive all blessings is why we fast in Lent as it provides a mechanism to recenter our sights on how Christ is working in our lives.

In addition to Job, I tend to reflect on the temptation of Christ in the desert quite often and pray on the idea of what it means to hunger. The temptation of Christ demonstrates the need that we all must enter the desert separate from the world and set time strictly for God alone. Matthew's account for this event mentioned Christ having a hunger following this 40-day fast. One can presume that this hunger mentioned can be a literal need for food and drink, but it very well can also show a hunger or desire for his ministry growing. We can see this by Christ providing food and drink whether it's the Bread of Life Discourse, the woman at the well, or the countless other miracles completed during his ministry.

Reflecting on Job and Christ in these two capacities has helped me to recognize the importance my own disposition when it comes to prayer, fasting, and almsgiving. These pillars provide opportunities of taking small disciplines and training ourselves to recognize how God can enter our suffering. It is through these intentional acts of self-denial that we continue to see how Christ is present in our carrying of the cross.

—Matthew Aaseng
Director of Youth and Young Adult Ministry
