The Code of Canon Law of the Catholic Church is the body of laws and regulations created by the Church to govern its own internal affairs and the lives of its members. Baptismal records are created and managed according to that law, where there are specific requirements for maintaining baptismal registers, the information that must be included, and the procedures for issuing certificates. Baptism certificates are more than a recording of the person's date of baptism, the church of baptism, and godparents. The back of the certificate is also important, it provides the information about a person's sacramental life. The original parish where a person is baptized becomes the official place for recording a person's sacramental records. If that person receives another sacrament such as first communion, confirmation, marriage, etc., that information is transmitted from the new church back to the original church and placed on the back of the certificate. Should you ever request a copy of your baptismal certificate to meet the Church requirements to serve as a godparent, or a sponsor, or be married in the Church, or seeking an annulment, your baptism certificate should come from your parish of record, and will include those vital notations necessary to comply with Canon Law. If the parish no longer exists, you would call the parish that merged or absorbed the records or contact the local bishop's office for assistance. Baptismal certificates are not legal documents and are no longer recognized for official identification purposes. However, they are still used sometimes as supplemental documents, but they are not sufficient to confirm identity. Now-a-day, birth certificates, social security cards and passports are used for official identification purposes.

A group of European bishops have approached the Vatican and Pope Leo XIV for help on a baptism legal matter resulting from a Belgian court case about the removal of names from Catholic Church records. The Court of Justice of the European Union is currently hearing a case brought by the Brussels Court of Appeal, which asked for clarification about whether the Catholic Church's refusal to erase names from baptismal records when requested is in violation of Europe's General Data Protection Regulation. That Regulation has governed the processing of personal data in Europe since 2018. Alessandro Calcagno, a lawyer, and assistant general secretary of the Catholic bishop's conference in Europe explained that when a baptized Catholic would ask to be removed from a register, usually a note was written in the margin of the register stating, "formal apostasy (abandonment) from the faith." The baptism record would remain in the register as a historical fact. At the end of 2023 someone in the Diocese of Chent in Belgium asked for all their baptismal data to be removed completely from the church's register. The diocese refused. Mr. Calcagno described the situation as a legal tug-of-war between the authorities and the Church. He described both Belgium and the Netherlands of using secular civil courts to interpret canon law. He said "This is a great danger because if you start to enter into a law that is not your own, you start to manipulate (that law)." "Canon law does not allow the modification or cancellation of registrations made in the baptismal register, except to correct possible transcription errors. The purpose of this register is to provide certainty regarding certain acts, making it possible to verify their actual existence." So the European bishops are at the Vatican to gather information and form arguments to present to the court of the European Union to answer their legal questions. The process may take several years before a court decision is reached. A 2023 report stated that 1,270 Catholics in Belgium requested their names be removed from the baptismal register. The main reason they gave was their outrage over the handling of sexual abuse scandals.
